To assess the visual acuity of custom chrome solutions (measured in 0% NACD) in human eyes. In this study, 21 emmetropic and 10 myopic participants in an experiment that assessed relative visual acuity of custom chrome solutions and back and white print images. The subjects read a newspaper print like message on the eye with the greatest visual acuity. The visual acuity of the eye with best vision was assessed by presenting a pair of letters equidistant each. Three sets of 3 successive readings were performed for each eye and the average of these successive readings was used for statistical analysis. A minimum of 1 mm was allowed between the eyes to avoid binocular effects of the print and to control for multiple possible confounds. Subjective visual acuity was correlated well with the published values for the same solutions ( $r = 0.98$ ). The mean increase in visual acuity for back and white print images as compared to custom chrome solutions was 2.28 lines, but visual acuity did not decrease when the print presented in letters level. The color vision of most participants was somewhat impaired with custom chrome solutions. However, the color discrimination task
